The alchemists who lived during the Middle Ages were obsessed with discovering the key to immortality and unlocking the secret to universal happiness. They believed that the answer lay somewhere within nature, so they studied and manipulated the four natural elements - earth, air, water and fire. They believed that their experiments would eventually identify and isolate a mysterious 5th Element that was the essence of the soul and was responsible for all life. If they could capture it they would be able to heal all hurt, experience untold bliss and live forever.

When they stumbled upon the art of distillation they were sure that they had taken a major step forward. When they ran wine through a simple still, the alchemists became the first alcohol distillers. The "spirit" that they created fascinated them and they began to flavour, age, mix, and otherwise study the fiery new liquid. When they drank this spirit they felt invigorated, their old pains began to fade away and a feeling of satisfaction drifted over them. The alchemists called their discovery aqua vite (the water of life) and described it as the "quint-essence", or 5th Element.
